Cover Picture: A grey-headed flying fox (Pteropus scapulatus). Unlike most bats, flying foxes (suborder Megachiroptera) do not echolocate, and their visual system is highly developed. As in primates and cats, the prestriate belt anterior to the primary visual area contains a single, but discontinuous, representation of the entire contralateral hemifield. The organization of prestriate cortex in these mammals is discussed by Rosa, Schmid, and Pettigrew (pages 52–68 of this volume).
